METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE—"DIE TOTE STADT," opera by Erich Wolfgang Korngold, with Marietta, soprano, and other artists.

"Die Tote Stadt" opera in three acts, libretto by Paul Schott, music by Erich Wolfgang Korngold, was performed at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon for the first time in this country. The opera was received with applause by a somewhat perplexed audience, which had no difficulty, however, in deciding that it cordially approved of Mme. Marietta, the Viennese soprano, newly added to the company.

There may have been some question about the popular success of the opera, but Mme. Marietta, who is a very different personage from her Viennese reputation, seemed hardly to know just what to do with herself. She sang with a clear, ringing voice, and her singing was full of the spirit of the music. Her singing was full of the spirit of the music. Her singing was full of the spirit of the music.

The story of "Die Tote Stadt" has already been told. It is a story of a city which has been deserted by its inhabitants. The story is a story of a city which has been deserted by its inhabitants. The story is a story of a city which has been deserted by its inhabitants.
